This report informs you of what I am doing personally, along with friends and supporters, to promote open debate on the Holocaust story. It does not attempt to monitor the Revisionist movement. Smith's Report is published six times a year and is sent free to those of you who help me with contributions, press clippings, or with other information or in other ways. It isn't possible for me to do this work effectively without your help.

I welcome correspondence but can not reply to it unless it urgently addresses business to hand. If you do not want your name mentioned herein please say so in writing. Your generosity is the cornerstone of the successes I have had, and those I will continue to have, in helping to focus the light of free inquiry and open debate onto the Holocaust story, which it sorely needs.

THE HOLOCAUST CONTROVERSY:

The Case For Open Debate

By Bradley R. Smith

THE CONTEMPORARY ISSUE

There was no German policy of any of these...

the first ever serious examination of the ci...

might be "unfounded." All this goes on...

Nice photo, eh? I'll be 62 years old by the time you receive this. I never really expected to have a mug shot in the New York Times. But then our national paper of record has been turning its attention to CODOH with some regularity recently. On 11 December the Times published an opinion piece by David M. Oshinsky and Michael Curtis who are, respectively, professors of history and political science at Rutgers University. They called upon college newspapers across the country to stop publishing my article/advertisement "The Holocaust Controversy: The Case for Open Debate." Why? Because "if the Holocaust is not a fact, then nothing is a fact, and truth itself will be diminished." I understand their point of view, and I sympathize with these two distraught men. The profs were upset because the ad had appeared, under particularly grating (to them) circumstances in the Daily Targum, the student-run newspaper at Rutgers (see below).

On 15 January the Times ran an editorial discussing the College Project. The Times didn't mention either the name of the organization carrying it out or the title of the article in question: "The Holocaust Controversy: The Case for Open Debate." While the Times wants to talk about the Project, can no longer avoid talking about it, its editors understand that it is important to them to suppress the purpose of CODOH. This is the tack that other commercial newspapers are using, and now the college newspapers have taken to it as well, as at Ohio State, where I am addressed simply by my first name. It's not easy to get information from a "Bradley" in a country of 250 million individuals. I think I see the machinations of an invisible hand behind this maneuver. This may be what's called a conspiracy.

THE NEW YORK TIMES EDITORIALS/LETTERS WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 15, 1992

Ugly Ideas, and Democracy

Bradley Smith is a Californian who acknowledges that the Nazis were cruel to Jews but who denies that the Holocaust ever happened. He has tried to expound his views in a 4,000-word essay submitted as an advertisement to several college newspapers — giving headaches and heartaches to student editors. In the process he gives the public some valuable, if unintended, lessons in the workings of a free press.

Many readers would blanch if they came upon Mr. Smith's pseudo-scholarly tract. Yes, he concedes, Jews were mistreated by the Nazis, and "many tragically perished in the maelstrom." But the idea that Nazi Germany exterminated six million Jews, Mr. Smith contends, is an irresponsible exaggeration. Gas chambers? A myth. Those actually were "life-saving" fumigation shelters to de-louse clothing and prevent disease.

Should college editors risk appearing mercenary by taking money for publishing such trash? Should they risk playing censors to protect other young minds by refusing the ad? Is there some middle course, like printing the ad but with appraisals of its bizarre musings?

The dilemma is acute, just as it can be for commercial newspapers when confronted with ads that offend decency, patriotism or commonly accepted history. But the first lesson here is that it is their dilemma and not a First Amendment question. That great ordinance directs that Congress make no law abridging free expression. Government may not censor Mr. Smith and his fellow "Holocaust revisionists," no matter how intellectually barren their claims. Whether to publish their ads is something for the newspapers to decide.

The second lesson is that there's probably no right answer to the question of how they should decide. College editors have come out in different ways. Newspapers at Harvard, Yale, Brown and the University of California turned the ad down. Those at Cornell, Duke, Northwestern and Michigan printed it, sometimes citing free speech.

Perhaps the most creative response was that of the student editors at Rutgers University. The Daily Targum newspaper rejected the Holocaust tract as advertising but ran the text in its news columns, along with an editorial denunciation and comment by invited authors. The editors thus transformed revulsion into education.

The public does not usually require protection from bad ideas. Even so, initial instincts in favor of publication may sometimes yield to exceptions, against quackery, for instance, or on behalf of taste or fairness. The Times, for instance, has from time to time refused advertisements — like one insisting that a politician killed in a plane crash had himself sabotaged the flight; that claim seemed unjustly unanswerable.

Denying the Holocaust may be monumentally more unjust. Yet to require that it be discussed only within approved limits may do an even greater injustice to the memory of its victims. To print or not to print? The diversity of responses from diverse editors demonstrates something more important than the answer. When there is free expression, even the ugliest ideas enrich democracy.

Letters To The Editor
New York Times

The Times editorial, "Ugly Ideas, and Democracy," wants to pretend that I alone am responsible for writing the article/advertisement titled "The Holocaust Controversy: The Case for Open Debate," that is appearing in university student newspapers. Wrong.

I'm not a historian. All the information in the ad is based on the work of Revisionist scholars in North America and Europe, published over the last 35 years. I have no funds of my own to buy space in campus papers. I depend on the kindnesses of interested laymen all over America.

No journalist or academic has revealed a single error of fact in the ad. In almost every case where either has expressed an opinion about it, he has contented himself with the childish amusement of name-calling or a call for censorship.

Holocaust scholarship, suppressed by our academics and newsmen, who for half a century have bought the State line on the story, has been discovered by the people. The old guard believes it can go on exploiting narrow ideas of "democracy" in order to suppress free inquiry and open debate on this one historical event.

It isn't going to work any more. The cat's out of the bag. The new scholarship is being delivered into the hands of the people.

UNIVERSITY OF TEXAS, The Daily Texan. This caper had more twists to it than I was prepared for. Last issue I reported that after the ad was accepted at the Texan it was challenged, passed through a review committee, was challenged again and was finally passed for publication by the Publications Committee of the Board of Trustees. David Cole and I returned to Los Angeles, savoring our victory. What we didn't take into sufficient consideration was the determination of the rabbi who heads Hillel on the Texas campus. He got hold of the Anti-Defamation League and they flew in a trouble shooter from Houston, "re-educated" the editorial staff of the Texan, saw that the Board met again where it changed its rules and under the new ones voted to reject publication of the ad. The truth is, the Hillel rabbis are getting under my skin.

RUTGERS UNIVERSITY, The Daily Targum. I like this story very much. This was our last chance to be published in early December, before the winter break. The Cornell Daily Sun had published a couple weeks earlier and it had caused such a flap, and the rabbis were in such a stew, that I didn't have high hopes for success at Rutgers. My fears were borne out when Steve Gottlieb, business manager for the Targum, called to say that the ad was too controversial for him to allow publication "at this time." He said he was returning my check.

Next day the managing editor of the Targum, Joshua Rolnick, called and asked for permission to publish the ad as an "opinion" piece. The Targum editorial staff had decided to stand with the spirit of the First Amendment against all the political pressure groups on the significantly Jewish campus, including the rabbis. It hadn't occurred to me that a paper would do such a thing. I said of course he could publish it. He would publish pieces opposing the ad in the same issue of the paper. Was that all right? I said sure. That's the purpose of the ad, to encourage open debate.

I held my breath. On 3 December I began getting calls from the media in and around New Brunswick, New Jersey and I discovered that the ad had indeed been published as an opinion piece, at no charge. It was then that the New York Times began to take the College Project seriously and published the article by Rutgers professors Curtis and Oshinsky.

I called Joshua Rolnick, told him how much I admired what he had done, that I understood that publication of the article under his supervision did not mean that he accepted as accurate everything in the ad or that he agreed with its premise. He didn't say anything. I asked him to send me an issue of the paper that carried the article and he said he would. But I didn't hear from him, the winter break came and went, and I called the Targum to inquire about buying past issues and subscribing to upcoming ones. I was told there were no more copies of the issue in which my ad had appeared. The Targum office didn't even have its own copies any longer. They could send me all issues of the winter quarter except that one. I arranged for it.

Then a couple days ago Joshua Rolnick rang me up. He apologized for not sending me the Targum issue with my article in it, but he would photocopy it for me and send along the articles that would interest me. He apologized for being so late with it. It had just got away from him over the holidays. Meanwhile, I had received the back copies of the Targum and as I was clipping them I came across a photograph of Joshua Rolnick over an article he had written for the sports page. I was a little flabbergasted by it. His face bears a striking resemblance to a young man I helped raise, at whose Bar Mitzvah I read, whose wedding I attended three years ago, and who I am no longer absolutely certain is still talking to me. I was moved in some peculiar way, and I felt a sentiment flow out from my heart toward Joshua Rolnick that wasn't very rational and very well might not have been appreciated by its target.

Meanwhile, the reaction to the running of the ad as an opinion piece produced articles with such headlines as "Conspiracies Against the Truth," "Censorship Codes?," "Faculty and Administrators Condemn 'Holocaust Revisionists' As Fraudulent" (signed by about 100 individuals including Curtis and Oshinsky), "Hundreds Refute Holocaust Ad," "Some Types of Speech Targeted by Government," "Divisive Response to CODOH Ad Plays into Their Hands," "Targum's Advertising Shows Prioritization of Bigotries," "A Requiem For Dachau," "Concentration Campus Could Be a Good Idea," and "Holocaust Ad Stirs National Controversy." There is also an interesting cartoon exploiting the human-skin lamp shade story.

About this time I discovered that both the Anti-Defamation League and the Simon Wiesenthal Center were sending letters to colleges all over American arguing that CODOH's ad should not be published because it is "misleading" and full of falsehoods. I wondered how likely it would be that after the winter break, after the letters, and after the extent of the scandal was fully realized that the Project would be able to pick up again toward the end of January where it had left off the first week in December.

No need to have worried.

OHIO STATE UNIVERSITY, The Lantern. My first batch of submissions in January went to Princeton, University of Virginia, Rice, Vanderbilt, Louisiana State, Nommo (the Black paper at UCLA), Portland State and Ohio State. Virginia, Nommo, and Portland State rejected the ad without fanfare.

On the morning of 20 January the ad manager of the Ohio State Lantern called to say that they would run the ad on Thursday the 23rd. I was elated, though I don't like to admit to such excitement at my age. On the morning of 21 January he called again to say that the Anti-Defamation League had got wind of the ad and had gone straight to the president of the university, E. Gordon Gee. The result was, publication would be delayed, and that it would go before the publications committee to be voted up or down. I felt a little rush of anxiety, though I don't like to admit to such things at my age.

I sweated it out for two days. On the afternoon of the 23rd he called again to say that the ad had been voted down. I hate to say it, but I was very disappointed. Ohio State is the largest university in America. What a coup if we could have gotten in there! That evening I did a three hour radio interview by telephone with Steve Cannon over WTVN Columbus. During the program there was some talk that the editorial staff at the Lantern was going to publish the ad as an opinion piece. I didn't bother to take it seriously.

The next morning I began getting phone calls from Ohio media. The ad had, indeed, been published, as an opinion piece, by the editorial staff on First Amendment principles. The managing editor is Samantha Haney. She's 22 years old. She has a lot of courage. At the same time, the staff purged the ad of its advertising material and changed the headline from "The Holocaust Controversy: The Case for Open Debate" to the misleading one of "Writer Claims Holocaust a Hoax." An editorial appeared excoriating racists and anti-Semites, myself among them, without demonstrating that I am guilty of either charge, together with a foolish and ignorant column by Ohio State President E. Gordon Gee. His column was described in the Lantern editorial as a "beautiful" piece of work. Sucking up a little to "the Man?"

Bradley's propaganda not honest revisionism

To print or not to print: students, Journalism faculty and members of the community have recently debated that question. At issue was an advertisement that the Holocaust was a hoax, not a historical event. That the cruelties suffered in concentration camps were unfounded exaggerations. That crematoriums and gas chambers were mere ghosts in the minds of haunted survivors.

Beyond those assertions, other issues loomed between the lines. The advertisement, although labeled as an advertisement, was presented as a four column news story, complete with a bolded headline. The text was filled with emotionally charged rhetoric, words like "thought police" and censors, to describe those who may be uncomfortable with "Holocaust Revisionism" — which, by the way, includes reputable scholars and historians across the country.

"Revisionism" is a form of historical scholarship that considers the causes and interpretation of historical events. In an insidious contortion of a legitimate academic process, "Holocaust Revisionists" attempt to rewrite history through what the Nazis termed "the big lie," and appeal to the American sense of fairness and our

President E. Gordon Gee

Constitution for an opportunity to be heard.

On the university campus, we hold sacred the opportunity for all points-of-view to be debated. But a pernicious lie is not a point of view, regardless of the cloak of legitimate scholarship it attempts to wear.

There is a distinct difference between honest "revisionism" and insidious fabrication. In the instance of what happened in the concentration camps of Nazi Germany, there is no legitimate revisionism. There is only intentional falsification of the most devious design.

With all its horror, the Holocaust happened. A few members of this Ohio State community know this personally because their parents, grandparents and children were gassed there. Six million Jews, and many hundreds of thousands of other victims including homosexuals and Gypsies, were systematically murdered by the Nazis during World War II.

Less than one third of our population today was alive during the World War II. The "Holocaust Revisionists" know this. They are aware that in totalitarian states such as the former Soviet Union, it has been possible to rewrite history by killing off those who would challenge their methods. The method of these "revisionists" is to attempt to create a doubt in those who cannot remember and their hope is, eventually, to rewrite history for a 21st century population in which there will be no one left who remembers the truth.

"Holocaust Revisionism" should not be dignified through paid advertising in a newspaper, which, by its own terms and conditions, "cannot accept advertising that . . . violates normal standards of morality and taste, or attacks an individual race, nationality, ethnic group, religion or sex."

This advertisement, or rather opinion, conveys derogatory ideas about Jews and distorts history to an extent as ludicrous as suggesting slavery never happened. I do not, in any way, ascribe to the content conveyed in Bradley's piece.

Some wonder why such an advertisement even poses a dilemma. After all, it is not unusual for newspapers to decide not to run certain advertisements, especially one they consider to violate taste or community standards. Advertising policy is largely a matter of ethic, not law. To be sure, this would be enough for many to tell Smith to take his money elsewhere.

There are good reasons the college newspapers of other institutions that value academic freedom and believe in the First Amendment of the Constitution — including Yale, Harvard, Brown, Penn, Dartmouth, Texas, UCLA, Berkeley, Minnesota and Wisconsin — have not printed this advertisement. Sometimes you simply do what you know is right.

According to the "Terms and Conditions" of the Lantern, the School of Journalism Publications Committee had the responsibility to make the judgement. If I had been a member of the Publications Committee, I would not have voted to publish the advertisement.

I applaud their decision, and I hope that free exchange of ideas embodied in the values of our university community will render Smith's cleverly disguised idea for what it is: propaganda.

E. Gordon Gee, President

Letters to the Editor
The Lantern
Ohio State University

President E. Gordon Gee writes (24 January) that I use "emotionally charged rhetoric" to urge open debate on the Holocaust story. He appears to think that's bad. Gee then charges that I use the techniques of "the big lie," the "pernicious lie," "insidious fabrication," "intentional falsification," "devious design" and "propaganda." He doesn't demonstrate that any of it is true, but what's that to a scholar of Gee's dimensions?

President Gee charges that I write that "the Holocaust was a hoax" (I do not), that crematoriums "did not exist in the German camps (I do not), and that I convey "derogatory ideas about Jews," implying that the article attacks Jews as a people (it does not).

What President Gee knows and does not know about the alleged genocide of the European Jews can be very easily addressed. He writes that there are members of the Ohio State community who know "personally" that their "parents, grandparents and children were gassed...."

All Gee needs to do to change my life around is to present The Lantern with one demonstrable, wartime generated proof for one

"gassing" in an extermination gas chamber of one relative or any individual associated with Ohio State. I shouldn't think it would be all that difficult for a man of Gee's intellectual stature.

However, if he can't do it himself (forgive me), he can call upon any one of the hundreds of scholars currently working at Ohio State, or a team of them, say, all of whom know more about everything than I do and are nicer guys too. Such a band of stalwart men should well be able to pull Gee's chestnuts from the fire of his righteousness.

I'll wait.

(In a sense, it's a little pointless to reproduce here the texts of letters I've written to newspaper editors that remain unpublished. I only do it so you can get a sense of how I respond to men like E. Gordon Gee.)

LOUISIANA STATE UNIVERSITY. The Daily Reveille. I received funding for this ad back in November. I submitted it the first week in December but by then it was too late to be published effectively. The ad manager assured me there was no problem. He had run it by a couple of the editors and they didn't see any problem with it. But we would have to wait until 22 January for publication. It didn't look good. Too much time for too many things to go wrong, too many people to hear about it, too much pressure to be exerted against the paper.

Meanwhile, I was still working on the ad. I'd gotten a number of suggestions on how to improve the text and I wanted to incorporate as many of them as I could. As the 22nd approached, I decided to replace the text of the ad that had been in the hands of the Reveille for close to six weeks with the new, revised text. But I had waited too long to come to a decision and now I was told that publication would have to be delayed another seven days because the new text had arrived too late to go in on the 22nd. Based on past experience, I had a very bad feeling about what was going down.

Nevertheless, on the 28th I began getting calls from Baton Rouge media wanting information about CODOH and the history of the ad. On the 29th it was published. That was yesterday. Several more days will pass before I get solid information on what's happening on the LSU campus.

VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY, The Hustler. This is one that Dr. Robert Countess took care of for CODOH. He walked it into the Hustler office in Nashville, and yesterday he called to say that the ad had been printed on the 24th, the same day it came out in the Ohio State Lantern. More on this one, and on LSU and the rest of the campuses that we're targeting in the next issue.

BUSINESS

For the first time since June '91 we're including a catalog with this issue of SR. It lists the Files containing the press clippings generated from each of the universities where the CODOH ad has been published. I think you'll find them very interesting and a lot of fun. If you've asked for something from a previous catalog and haven't received it or there's some other problem, please call collect and Magaly will get it straightened out for you.

EXPENSES: All of the monies for the published ads were donated by sponsors and the ads were paid for by cashiers check at the time of publication. Those of you who have been thinking about sponsoring one or more ads but haven't done it yet, this is the time. I look forward to hearing from you.

The funds to cover other business expenses and to support my family are still needed. These kinds of outlays, while they are minuscule compared to the multi-million dollar budgets of organizations like the Simon Wiesenthal Center ($9 million per year) or the ADL (several times that), are nevertheless very difficult for me to handle. Following are my pay-outs for business (only) expenses for December 1991 and January 1992.

Not much, I'd say, for a public relations campaign that has reached some of the top student newspapers in academia and has stirred up the prestige press as well. Others spend millions of dollars to buy this kind of recognition and influence. We get it by disseminating the truth in places where it has never before seen the light of day.

Your help with these expenses is much appreciated. Without your help they simply go unpaid and the little credit I have is compromised.

The Campus Project is flying high. I'm going to go straight ahead with it for the next few months, but it is already time to begin to think about what directions it should take in the new school year in September.

I wish all of you all the best.
